Cal Promotional emails:

Promotional emails focus primarily on getting the word out about your product or service to potential customer. These emails could share coupons or discounts, provide access to gated content, or announce an upcoming special event.

Newsletter emails:

Newsletter emails are widely used and are usually sent on a regular schedule. These emails may contain company updates, event or promotional announcements, and company blog content.

(c) lead nurturing emails?

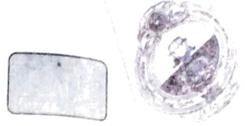

Lead nurturing emails are often automated email sequences that help advance potential customers. The automated aspect of these emails lower the time and content investment and makes sure you don't forget to send at a certain stage or let prospect fall out of the funnel.

(d) survey emails?

Survey emails are a data collection method you can use to collect quantitative data from your customers - with surveys or questionnaires sent via email.

(e) milestone emails?

Milestone emails are a chance for you to connect with your customers by highlighting milestones personal to the customer or about their relationship with your company.

Welcome emails?

Welcome emails are usually the very first email communication that you have with a potential or current customer. You could send a welcome email after a customer's initial action with your company.

Dedicated emails?

Dedicated emails - sometimes called stand-alone emails are sent to inform your email list of one specific offer. For example, you can use dedicated emails to let customers know about a new resource you've published or invite them to have a very specific CTA, which makes them quicker and easier to measure. These emails aren't sent as regularly as some of the others on this list because they're dependent on the offering or event you're promoting.
